

Welcome to the Case Report special. Case reports are an important source of knowledge in medicine and is a common way of sharing ones experiences with our peers and juniors. Case reports are the most common submissions to our journal. In the normal course of things we can only accommodate two of them. This leads to significant back logs and delay in the publication of these manuscripts. The academic value of the case report is often questioned, however we at PJR feel that they have a significant relevance especially in our environment. To highlight the importance of the humble case report we are dedicating this issue to them. I hope you find them as interesting and useful as their authors had intended them to be.

Zafar Sajjad

Editor